On a server supporting 4000 users, we have a table which stores a list of users available to perform work based on the hours they are working. Each user has two "notes", one for work and one for leisure. When users are absent or are not available they are moved to a "do not work" note. If there are users who are working, and another user moves to a "do not work" note, an error message is sent to an email address, and the user's do not work note is moved to the work note. In this case, the user won't be able to work until they've been moved back. This all works fine. My problem is that this table has had a lot of activity recently and is prone to locking up during periods of high activity, throwing the server into a full lock-up. The basic query which locks the table reads as follows: select ua.id, ua.email, ua.avail_num, ua.do_work_num, ua.descr, ua.hours from avail_users avu join users ua on avu.id = ua.id where avu.userid = 65 Each user id is listed, and where avu.userid = 65 then that row is read. I have checked every user id in the system to make sure it's not trying to access anything in this table, but they have something that is doing this. I have enabled any locking on the table, and I use BEGIN TRANSACTION and COMMIT, but this isn't helping. I think the problem is caused by the number of rows I am trying to select from the table at once.
